New Neptune Engine For Fire Laddies of Fifty Years Ago Proved Its Ability - 700 Ton Propeller/ Launched at Thamesville Yard—Gen. Burnside Superseded By Gen. Hooker in Command of Army of the Potomac.

The old Neptune fire company, No. 5, this week fifty years ago tried out their new engine, putting it to the test in Frankin square by first sending a stream up onto the tower of the Universalist church, which then stood where the Chelsea Savings bank building now is. Then the fire laddles tried for a stream that would top the city flag staff on the square. They didn't quite reach the top, but concluded the test well satisfied that the new engine would fill the bill when called on for actual service.

In the war news the chief event was the replacement of General Burnside "Joe" Hooker, "Fighting Joe" as he was called, in the command of the Army of the Potomac, General Burnside and been the subject of much unfavorable criticism for the disastrous battle of Fredericksburg, but an editorial of the New York Times of that period came to Burnside's defence with the open charge that it was disaffection and lukewarmness on the part of some of his generals that was accountable for this repuise of the part of some of his generals that was accountable for this repuise of the enemy was begun with complete success with an attack by the troops of General Meade, but that the heavy support which General Franklin was to have sent up to drive home the advantage was ordered forward so availage was ordered forward so availage.
